The significant tornado parameter is one of many models recently created by the National Storm Prediction Center to predict the possibility of severe weather. This parameter looks at the winds, potential energy, and rotation in the atmosphere and performs calculations based on its predicted state. As more research on tornadoes has become available, this relatively new model has become more refined. Come take a look at its derivation and how it is used to predict tornadoes.